We have reported that resveratrol can inhibit cancer cell proliferation and induce apoptosis in vitro. This study was designed to further examine the effect of resveratrol on the proliferation and apoptosis of human breast cancer cells (MCF-7). The resveratrol-induced cell cycle arrest and apoptosis were examined by flow cytometry and in situ TUNEL assay. We found that resveratrol significantly inhibited proliferation of human breast cancer cells in a dose-dependent manner and induced G1 cell cycle arrest. The cell cycle arrest was accompanied by increased expression of p21, p27, and down-regulation of cyclin D1 and CDK2. These results suggest that resveratrol induces G1 arrest through upregulation of cyclin-dependent kinase inhibitors p21 and p27 and downregulation of cyclin D1 and CDK2. Also, the percentage of apoptotic cells increased with increasing resveratrol dose. Apoptosis was accompanied by increased expression of Bax and Bak and decreased expression of Bcl-2. Our data also indicated that the induction of apoptosis was associated with the activation of caspase-9 and caspase-3. These results indicate that resveratrol induces cell cycle arrest and apoptosis by upregulation of p21, p27, and Bax and downregulation of Bcl-2. It is suggested that resveratrol may be a useful agent in the prevention and treatment of breast cancer.
